Be a Good Little Widow
Welcome to The Old Globe

The Sheryl and Harvey White Theatre has served The Old Globe, in part, as a crucible for exciting new work. It’s been a launching pad for world premiere plays like Jonathan Caren’s The Recommendation and Matthew Lopez’s Somewhere. Last season also saw the birth of two new musicals in this space: Gaby Alter and Itamar Moses’ Nobody Loves You and Steven Sater and Burt Bacharach’s Some Lovers. Theatre in the round creates a unique sense of intimacy between actor and audience, one that encourages deep listening and powerful emotional investment. What better place to introduce Globe audiences to dynamic new writers like Bekah Brunstetter, whose Be a Good Little Widow is making its West Coast Premiere with this production.

Bekah’s play is in excellent hands with director Hal Brooks. As the Artistic Director of the Cape Cod Theatre Project and the Associate Artistic Director of the Ojai Playwrights Conference, Hal has built a career around developing new plays and staging them with sensitivity and style. We are delighted to have him here at The Old Globe for the first time.

Keep your eye on the Sheryl and Harvey White Theatre in the seasons ahead. You’ll find a space for experimentation, for risk-taking, for new voices trying out new ideas. We hope you’ll join us!

Interview by Danielle Mages Amato

WHERE DID THE IDEA FOR BE A GOOD LITTLE WIDOW COME FROM?

Widow was actually my very first play commission ever (from Ars Nova in New York City). In early 2009, if you recall, there were a fair amount of plane crashes, starting with a commuter plane that crashed into a house in upstate New York. This tragedy unlocked a visceral, intense anxiety in me that I’m still attempting to quiet. I couldn’t stop thinking about the crash, and so I had to write about it. At the time, I was also spending a fair amount of brain space pondering my own emotional maturity. I found myself wondering: when would I grow up? At that point in my life, I’d never been to a funeral. Never experienced a great loss. I was terrified of what it would feel like and if I’d be able to act a lady through it. I found myself jealous of those who had experienced tragedy, as it seemed to make them drop into themselves.
And so, I shoved all of these worries and questions together into a play. Most importantly, I now cannot die in a plane crash, because it would just be too ironic. I hope. Now I have to go knock on nine types of wood.

The cross-generational relationship between Melody and Hope is one of the unforgettable things about the play—not only because of their conflicts but because of the gifts they have to offer each other. Would you talk a little bit about that?

I love that relationship too, and it was shockingly satisfying to write. I think it’s pretty much a dramatization of an argument that’s constantly going on in me, between my proper self and my improper self. But thankfully, it’s played out with characters. I oftentimes feel like a mess. I wasn’t raised that way, but I do, more often that not, find myself in situations where I feel like my dress or nail-biting or the way I eat my cheese is offending, well, everyone. But then, there’s also something incredibly liberating about being a mess. Via messiness (a la Melody) you have easier access to your emotions.

from the Artistic Director

One of The Old Globe’s strongest assets is the breadth of its repertoire. On our three stages we produce Shakespeare (our house writer), musicals, classics from the American and world canon, and brand new writing. As the largest theatre in San Diego, the second largest in California, and the sixth largest in the United States, we have a mandate to serve a broad constituency—to provide, as it were, something for everyone—and the wide range of material in one of our typical seasons is a natural expression and fulfillment of our mission.

My job is of course to select the material we produce. The process can be dizzying. After all, any one genre of theatre has in it dozens of worthwhile plays. You want a French classic? There’s Molière, Marivaux, Racine, Corneille, Ionesco. German? Brecht, Goethe, Schiller. You want a musical? Should it be a revival or an original work? An epic, Broadway blowout with chorus girls and two dozen sets, or a chamber piece with a small cast and a piano?

But in no area do I feel more spoiled for choice than in new American writing. These days one hears endless proclamations of doom and despair about the state of the contemporary American theatre, but if the measure of our industry’s health is the number of people writing for it and the number of accomplished works they are creating, then I’m an optimist. There are hundreds of terrific, worthy, smart, and provocative new plays being written right now, by countless devoted, innovative, and deeply talented individuals in communities all across this country. Indeed, I’d go so far as to argue that we are living in a Golden Age of American playwriting.

Tonight’s play is a prime example. Bekah Brunstetter is by no means a household name. She will be, though, and soon, on the strength of Be a Good Little Widow and a growing body of imaginative and emotionally engaged plays. Widow is a small gem of a piece, deceptive in its simplicity but devastating in its sincerity and commitment to psychological truth. In her characterization of her heroine, Melody, Brunstetter has her finger firmly on the pulse of this moment in popular culture, in which smart, hyperarticulate, searching, and slightly mystified twenty-something women are the subjects of books, essays, songs, and hit cable TV series. But inasmuch as she’s a figure in a work of theatre art rather than a profile in Vanity Fair, Melody has a dimensionality and emotional verisimilitude that is rich, striking, and to me completely disarming. Profane and wretchedly immature one moment, profoundly self-actualized the next, Melody becomes a kind of Everywoman, thrown into an experience that’s all too widespread, but making of it something new. She turns widowhood into a strange form of art, fashioning from deep loss a new sense of self, and from grief a very modern kind of hope.

On the first day of rehearsal I told the Globe company that the play is for me a kind of Trojan Horse. Its beguiling outside, charming and funny, makes us drop our defenses and open our gates. But once we’ve let it in, the play’s belly bursts open and lets loose a troop of furious Greeks—here, Brunstetter’s slyly deployed characters in all their confusion and intensity—who slay us, move us, and rend our hearts. The captain of this theatrical Trojan Horse is my esteemed colleague Hal Brooks, an artist who, like our playwright, is a real devotee of theatrical truth. He and his cast have served Brunstetter well and brought to the Globe a sterling example of what today’s American theatre is all about: meaningful stories on themes that matter, told with panache and a sensibility that, while by no means sentimental, loves laughter and bears no tears. I’m proud to be part of it.

Thanks for coming. Enjoy the show.

Music is an important component of Be a Good Little Widow — it permeates the production and helps define character and mood. Music also plays a significant role in playwright Bekah Brunstetter’s writing process. She says, “I had a playlist when I was first writing the piece, and I tend to always have at least one song when I’m writing that I listen to over and over to help me access the emotional underpinnings of what I’m working on.” Brunstetter put together a playlist for Melody, a peek inside the character’s musical world.

To truth. But simultaneously, I love the decorum of Hope’s way of life, with its cloth napkins and its rules. I wish I had the fortitude, charm and class of the women of generations before me. It’s just a question that interests me. We’re so, so much more open now — as people, as women. Is this better? Worse? Either way, I have respect for both ways of life.

WHAT HAVE BEEN THE MOST CHALLENGING ASPECTS OF THIS PLAY — EITHER IN WRITING IT OR GETTING IT ON ITS FEET? WHAT’S BEEN MOST FUN?

It’s a really delicate balance, tone-wise. It was tough to write, and has been tough to work on, as I’m expecting myself, my actors, my director and subsequently my audience to be yanked from tears to laughter and back again, sometimes even both simultaneously. But I couldn’t help but try and have a laugh during an incredibly tragic time. We say the most ridiculous things when we’re hurting, and I really wanted to try and capture that. Also, in terms of the darker moments of the play, I had to really make sure those were organic. I never want to manipulate my audience’s emotions.

With Melody, I wanted to write her youth and her journey from immaturity to approaching womanhood honestly. To do so, I had to honor the fact that she’s selfish. Potentially grating. It’s tricky to start with a character that could be perceived as unlikeable — thanks, the success of “Girls!” But I really, truly believe that she’s trying, trying to be a good wife, and subsequently a good widow, and that’s what really counts. Her heart is constantly in the right place. Lastly, it’s just one young woman’s story. Or rather, two, Melody and Hope’s. When you write a small-ish play, you always hope that it transcends its size and touches its audience in some universal way.

Do you find yourself returning to specific themes over and over in your work, or to specific styles?

Definitely. I always write in dramedy. Sometimes on the heavier side, but I always, always need to be able to laugh at myself when I’m working on something, and I need my characters to be able to do the same. I also keep returning to worlds that are grounded in reality but are theatrical in some way. As for themes, my first plays were all about love, faith and odd, contemporary re-tellings of Bible stories. I then shifted into a “military family play” phase, then into “how to be an adult in this world” and “what is death?” phases. Now that I’m the ripe old age of 30, I find myself thinking and writing a lot about morality — and where exactly it comes from — and my family history. I’m also thinking a lot about babies. But not so much writing about them. Mostly just spying on them on the internet.

WHAT ARE YOU CURRENTLY WORKING ON?

I’m currently writing for ABC Family’s fantastic Peabody Award-winning show, “Switched at Birth.” I’m taking a wee break from playwriting. This is the first time in four years I don’t have a commission (not woe is me, at all, but still), and I want whatever play I work on next to just hit me in the face one day (hopefully not while I’m driving), and then I’ll start writing it. I’m patiently waiting for that. I don’t want to force it. In the meantime, I scratch my theatre itch with my custom-made monologue business for actors and tend to say “Yes, please!” anytime anyone asks me to write a short play, because I love any excuse to write one. I’m also working on a movie called Together/Apart which one might call a romantic comedy but with more words.
Widow's Weeds

MOURNING IN THE PUBLIC EYE

By Danielle Mages Amato

From widowed queens to the mothers of fallen soldiers, women have long been asked to bear the weight of mourning in powerful, public ways. The rituals of mourning have historically played out on women's bodies, involving everything from what clothing a widow must wear to what she may eat to whether she is allowed out of bed in the morning — and in some cultures, whether she is allowed to live at all.

In many eras, public mourning was as much about social status as grief. Mourning properly could raise one's social standing, and failing to do so often carried a social cost. Dressing and acting like a "good" widow was both a status symbol and a social necessity. In the 21st century, expectations are less fixed, and yet women like Melody in Be a Good Little Widow still find themselves on a social tightrope, trying to find the "proper" way to execute the ever-evolving traditions of grief.

Many Eastern cultures still use white as the color of mourning, but the Western custom of wearing black dates back to the ancient Romans, who tore their garments and blackened them with dirt after the death of a loved one. (Some also believed that black clothing would protect the wearer from the roving soul of the deceased.) It is no coincidence that traditional widows' garments resemble nuns' habits — the two were established during the same period and with much the same intent: to mark a change of life for a woman expected to stand apart from society. The phrase "widow's weeds" comes from the Old English word "waed," which means garment or cloth.

By the 15th and 16th centuries, sumptuary laws set out strict legal requirements for mourning clothing, dictating in painstaking detail the quality, style and amount of fabric the bereaved must wear — the higher the rank, the more elaborate the clothing. Mourning caps also came into fashion during this period. These "Mary Stuart caps," with their sharp vee over the forehead, were the origin of the term “widow’s peak.” As late as the 1700s, many aristocratic European widows faced the “mourning bed.” Not only were they confined to their homes but also to their beds — beds draped entirely in black, with black sheets and black fabric covering walls, ceilings and floors. Customs like these reveal a profound fear: a fear of the contagion of grief, a fear that, even in the absence of disease, death is catching. Such fear can only be allayed by the comfort of rules strictly followed.

The Victorian era took its name from Europe’s most famous widow, the queen who would profoundly shape traditions of public mourning for generations to come. Victoria was 42 when her husband Albert died. She donned black and wore it until the day she died — 40 years later. Inspired by Victoria’s public act of devotion, English mourning rituals grew more and more elaborate, so elaborate that an entire industry grew up to support them. On the death of a loved one, the family would often hire two “mutes” to stand at the door of the home. Dour-faced and statue-still, wearing top hats and black sashes, mutes were human symbols of death. These mutes would also lead the funeral procession, carrying baskets of black ostrich feathers, walking ahead of the horses (black or dyed black for the occasion) that pulled the glass-walled hearse.

The Victorian mourning industry was geared largely toward women. Women’s magazines featured mourning advice columns where anxious widows could parse the etiquette of grief. Their pages were filled with advertisements for one-stop mourning warehouses, where widows could purchase everything from dresses to black-edged handkerchiefs. One memorable Vogue magazine article on the latest mourning fashions declared, “Correct mourning is a science; becoming mourning is a fine art.”

In both England and the United States, those mourning fashions were most often made of black crepe — a crinkled silk fabric that became the gold standard for widow’s weeds. In addition to being highly flammable and extremely uncomfortable, crepe disintegrated in water, and when worn as a “weeping veil,” it often led to respiratory ailments, severe eye irritation and even blindness.

When World War I broke out, the high number of casualties led people to abandon the huge machinery of mourning that the Victorians had developed, moving toward a simpler, more restrained style. In the 20th century, Jacqueline Kennedy became perhaps the iconic widow, an image not only of poise in grief but of fashionable public presence: her oversized sunglasses and chic black suits a new model of widowhood.

In Bekah Brunstetter’s play, Melody finds herself caught in a gap between experience and expectation. In a modern American culture that makes death much less visible than in other time periods, she has no real experience of mourning, but she must still grapple with the weight of tradition and the expectations of her mother-in-law as she tries to craft a new identity for herself, to make herself into “a good little widow.”

Since then he directed more than 200 plays of all styles and periods and produced an additional 270 productions. His vision for The Old Globe resulted in the establishment of the Shakespeare Festival and the San Diego Junior Theatre in the late ’40s, the expansion to two theatres in the ’50s, Globe Educational Tours in the ’70s and Teatro Meta and the Old Globe/University of San Diego MFA program in the ’80s. During the 1940s, Mr. Noel served as dialogue director for the 20th Century Fox Studios and was the former director of the Ernie Pyle Theatre in Tokyo. Described by Variety as the eminence grise of San Diego theatre, Mr. Noel is one of the few San Diegans to have had an entire year (1987) proclaimed in his honor, and to be named one of San Diego’s “Living Treasures.” He was a founder of the California Theatre Council and a former vice president of the California Confederation of the Arts. His numerous honors include The San Diego Union-Tribune list of 25 persons who shaped the city’s history; the Governor’s Award for the Arts; University of Arizona Alumni Association’s Outstanding Citizen, for his contribution to their Fine Arts department; San Diego State University’s Outstanding Alumnus; Conservator of American Arts Award from American Conservatory Theater; the San Diego Press Club Headliner Award; San Diego Gentleman of Distinction Award; and a combined tribute from the Public Arts Advisory Council and the San Diego County Board of Supervisors. Mr. Noel was particularly proud of the following three honors representing education and theatre: Honorary Doctorate of Humane Letters, University of San Diego, Honorary Doctorate in Fine Arts, San Diego State University and the annual Awards for Excellence in Theatre named in his honor by the San Diego Theatre Critics Circle. In 2007, he received the National Medal of Arts – the nation’s highest honor for artistic excellence – in a ceremony at the White House. Craig Noel died on April 3, 2010 at the age of 94.

Artisans
AT WORK

Nothing is trendier than artisans. Americans have fallen under the spell of what writer Adam Sachs calls “the spirit of the handcrafted, the painstakingly procured, the small-batch.” Here at The Old Globe, we know the true meaning of “artisan.” Our staff of highly skilled artist-craftspeople is called upon to create everything from elaborate crystal chandeliers to realistic severed heads. For this season’s production of Pygmalion, Lead Craftsman Rory Murphy hand-sculpted a reproduction of an ancient Greek statue of the goddess Diana. It took 40 hours for Murphy to transform a block of polyurethane foam into the gorgeously draped figure, which was then sealed with a hard polyurethane coating. Globe craftsperson Trish Rutter cleaned the sculpture with acetone, primed it and painted it with a series of glazes to resemble marble. Top-notch artisans: just one reason why the Globe’s technical staff is considered among the best in the nation.

PUBLIC SUPPORT

Major funding provided by the City of San Diego Commission for Arts and Culture. The Old Globe is funded by the County of San Diego.
Since its opening during the California Pacific International Exposition in 1935, The Old Globe has brought the Bard’s plays to life for its audiences.

The Old Globe’s Education Department offers a variety of programs to enhance audience appreciation of Shakespeare, introduce children to the plays and lore, and train young actors in classical technique, developing the next generation of Shakespeare lovers and performers. Here’s a sampling of the Shakespeare Initiatives:

Shakespeare in the Garden Lectures — Actors, directors, dramaturgs and others offer brief, fascinating talks on the play that is scheduled to be performed that evening. These free events take place in the Craig Noel Garden before select performances on the Globe’s lower plaza one hour prior to showroom. Audience members bring their coffee, wine and snacks to the sitting area to listen to our engaging speakers discuss the play, its history and the director’s concept for the production. The talks end with a brief Q & A, and then audiences make their way to the theatre armed with knowledge and insight on the play they’re about to see.

Pre-Show Workshops for School Groups — Teachers love bringing their students to see the Globe’s Shakespeare productions. Actors from the shows visit the classes ahead of time to conduct free, interactive workshops. Students participate in theatre games and activities all designed to support comprehension and enjoyment of the performances.

Summer Shakespeare Intensive — Every summer, high school students descend on the Globe’s rehearsal halls for a four-week immersion in classical acting as they rehearse one-hour versions of two of Shakespeare’s plays. Workshops with actors from the Shakespeare repertory company are a key component of the program, providing students with a deeper understanding of the many skills they’ll need to perform their play. Then, on one joyous summer night (this year on August 12), they perform in full costume under the stage lights of the outdoor Lowell Davies Festival Theatre. The program is now a highlight in the memories of hundreds of young people who have participated over the last five years.

Follow the Bard Tours — Younger Bardophiles giggle their way through an interactive tour that highlights the life and plays of William Shakespeare. The tour is a hunt around the theatres for pictures, sculptures and actual props from many of the Bard’s plays. With each prop they find, students read lines from the play and learn about the plot from our engaging docents.

Touring Production — This year, The Old Globe tours a one-hour version of Shakespeare’s Twelfth Night to schools throughout San Diego County. The production is part of Shakespeare for a New Generation, a national program of the National Endowment for the Arts in partnership with Arts Midwest. The fully professional production introduces students to Shakespeare’s work and supports state and national curriculum standards.

The Old Globe celebrated the opening of Henrik Ibsen’s A Doll’s House on Thursday, March 28. The evening began with a pre-show Circle Patron Dinner. Following the performance, donors, sponsors and Board Members mingled with the cast and other members of the creative team at the opening night cast party. On April 8, donors enjoyed meeting actor Jefferson Mays from A Gentleman’s Guide to Love and Murder, one of the events in the popular Meet the Artist series.
